

He resets broken dreams.

Cory Downing has a dream much like many other boys: Someday to be a major-league baseball player, preferably with the Cardinals.

But, in the middle of a hard slide into second base, he thought his dream had come to a painful halt. Cory broke his leg in two places. University Physician Dan Hoernschemeyer, MD, treated Cory – put him on the base paths again.

Dr. Hoernschemeyer knows about childhood dreams. He, too, wanted to play for the Cardinals. He was a young, strong third baseman – good enough to be offered a baseball scholarship to Dayton University.

But it wasn't an injury that rerouted his dream. All it took was a trip to Shriners' Hospital in Sacramento where he discovered a new dream: Pediatric Orthopaedic Surgery.

Today, Dr. Hoernschemeyer and his colleague John Anderson, MD, are the only fellowship-trained pediatric orthopaedic surgeons in mid-Missouri. They specialize in just kids. Together they mend many little athletic dreams.
